The doctorate in International Studies is the flagship program of the School of International Studies. It brings together research departments (Economics, Humanities, Legal Studies, Sociology and Social Research) to construct an interdisciplinary research degree.

Starting from late April (exact date TBA), the School of International Studies will be accepting applications for admission to its doctoral program in International Studies. The doctorate is taught entirely in English and is characterized by a multidisciplinary approach. During the first year, students take courses in politics, law, economics, as well as research methods and academic writing, before focusing exclusively on their thesis research.

Application Deadline: late May 2012
